For purely practical reasons, this volume treats codices VIII and IX. Little of the contents of either of these codices is preserved, too little in fact to justify separate volumes for them. The five texts contained in these codices differ considerably one from the other, in their form as in their content or in the doctrines they advance—and this remains true whether the works are examined completely independently, or as members of their respective codices. Linguistically, however, there is a sharp distinction to be drawn between codex VIII and codex IX—as this concordance allows the reader to see for him or herself. But these differences are not more significant than those found elsewhere in the Nag Hammadi collection, even within a single codex, as in the case of codex VII.
